I teach a research section, and ProCon.org is one of the finest sources for honest research I have found for free on the interwebs. My school has limited resources and the free site is a blessing for my challenged students. I used the issue of Cow's Milk to model research- I began with ProCon.org, and then used keywords from the material there to direct my searches using other engines available. It was highly instructive. I have used the site with 10th graders, and now with 6th grade students. I find it delightful, fair, and balanced. Other sites are pushing their agenda, and of course are a great study in persuasive speech. The difference between ProCon.org and persuasive sites is yet another lesson in critical thinking.

I am sure space is what limits your choices to 40. However, if there were a way, I would dearly love to see an archive. New is fabulous, but that never meant older issues have gone out of interest.
